The United States has also been conducting B-52 raids against the Communists in northern Laos and providing only partial figures, however. only partial figures, however.

Symington is not expected to ask for the secret session until the week after next at the carliest, because he wants to let debate on amendments to the draft bill finish first. He will have no trouble obtaining it, because, according to a Senate official, any senator can demand and obtain a secret session if seconded by another senator.

Symington said yesterday that before the Senate votes any more money "for this clandestine war," it should be informed about "additional military developments" Laos.

The Symington announcement, made in a speech at Harvard University last night, reflects a new fear among some members of the Senate that U.S. involvement in the Laotian war, which has been dragging on for a number of years, may be a tunnel with no light at the end.

Two staff members of Symington's Foreign Relations Subcommittee on Security Agreements and Commitments Abroad testified last week that they learned during an April visit to Laos, that the CIA is now financing 4,800 Thai troops fighting in northern Laos on behalf of the Laotian government. The figure apparently was increased from only 1,000 a year ago.

Senators present at the closed meeting said the CIA felt those troops were needed because the Meo tribesmen supported by the CIA had been decimated in years of fighting.
